K O K O R O

A Japanese word often translated as heart.

But also mind.

Spirit.

Feeling.

Awareness.

The place where the world touches us,
and where we touch the world.

These haiku and photographs are offerings from that place.

KAZE DŌJŌ
THE WAY OF THE WIND

dropping the blinds
winter outside
fire in the oven

stores baissés
dehors l'hiver
le feu dans l'âtre

a log shifts
through the fire
the doorway opens

une bûche bascule
à travers le feu
la porte s'ouvre

KAZE DŌJŌ

cold hearth
in the corner of my eye
she tends the fire

âtre froid
du coin de l'œil
elle veille au feu

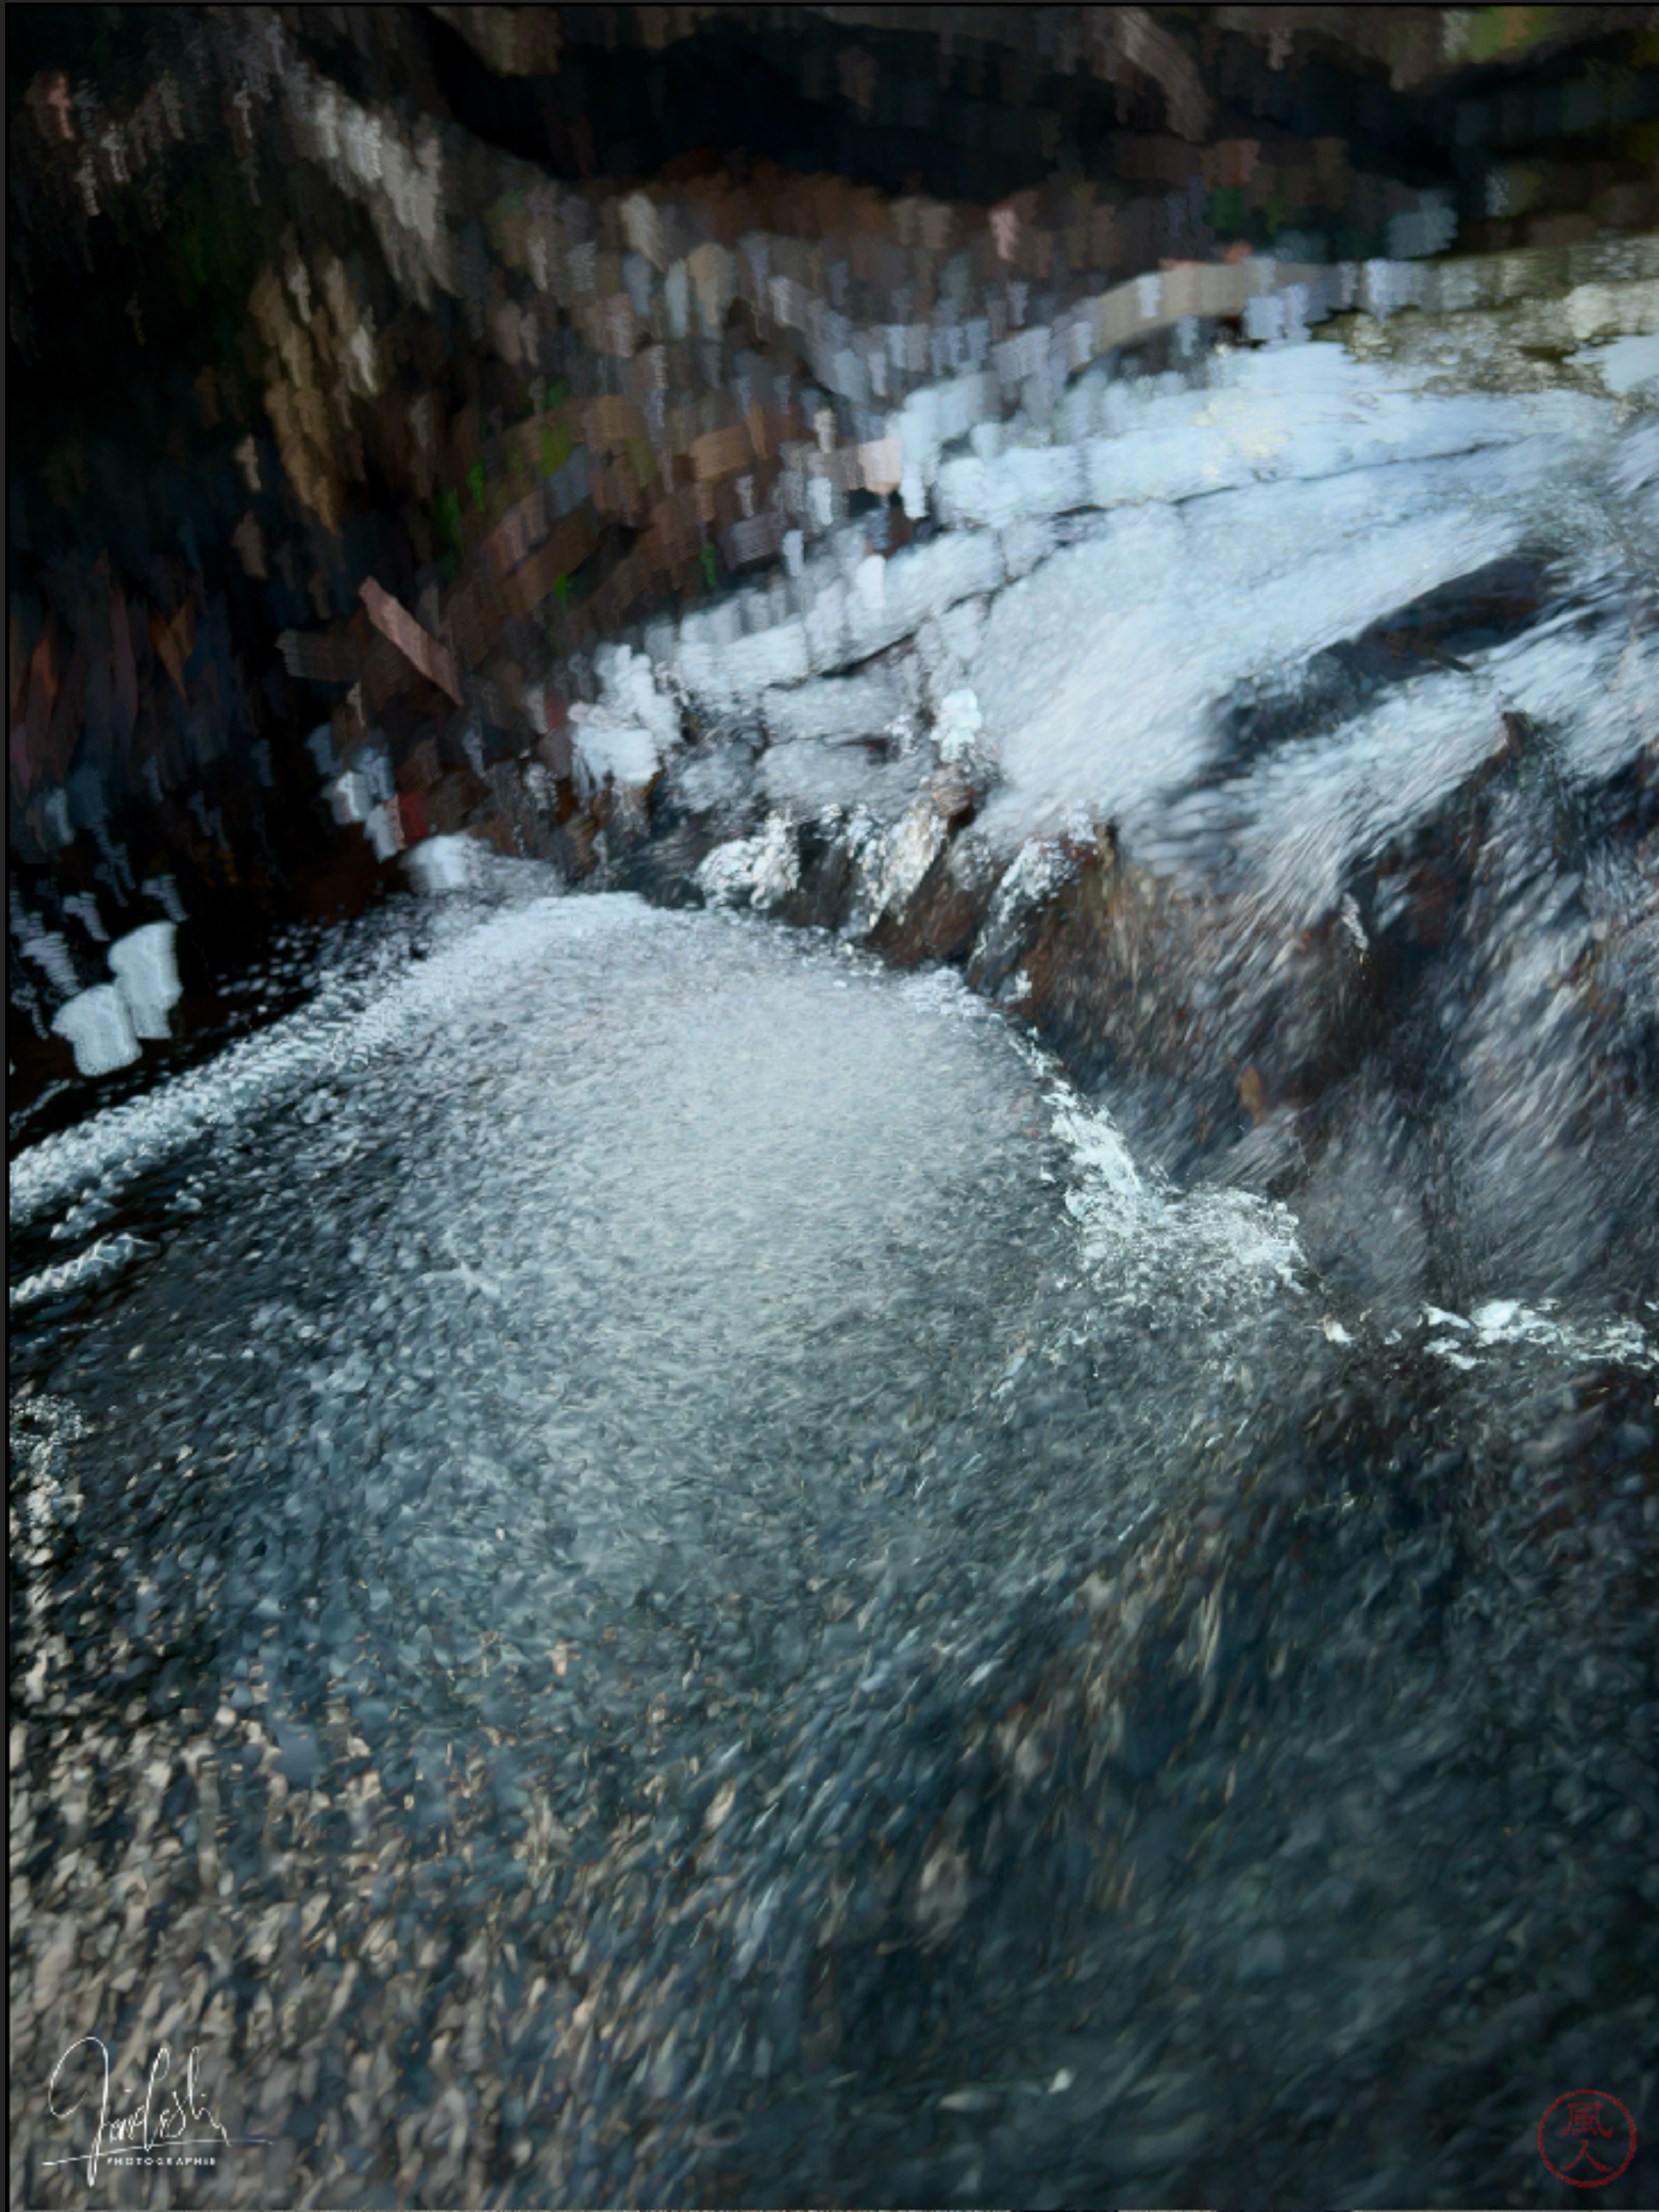

old photograph ~
a familiar face
melts away

vieille photo ~
un visage familier
se dissout

after the rain
water over stones
note after note

après la pluie
l'eau de pierre en pierre
une note puis l'autre

running water
each rock another note
rhyming the night

l'eau vive
chaque pierre une autre note
fait rimer la nuit

autumn current
my shadow loosens
from its name

courant d'automne
mon ombre se détache
de son nom

rain ending
between one drop
and the next

fin de pluie
entre une goutte
et la suivante

plum pudding
the table is set
for the bees

pudding aux prunes
la table est mise
pour les abeilles

all this blue
and still the plum tree
has somewhere to go

tout ce bleu
et pourtant le prunier
cherche plus loin

wattle rattle
one small branch
holds the sky

frisson du mimosa
une seule branche
porte le ciel

heat of the day
the long way down through the trees
promise of a drink

la chaleur du jour
une longue pente entre les arbres
la promesse d'un verre

In the Adelaide Hills of South Australia, moments appear and disappear as winter begins to loosen its hold.

Rain ending between one drop and the next.
The plum tree still has somewhere to go.
One small wattle branch holds the sky.

These haiku and haiga
are invitations to pause,
to notice, and to rediscover
the extraordinary hidden
within ordinary life.

*Water remembers.
So does the heart.*
